Understanding the Different Printing Methods & Colors

Offset Lithography

- » This is a standard printing process that uses water and/or oil to keep ink out of non printing areas on the plate.
- » The term offset comes from the fact that the ink design is transferred, or offset, onto something else before it goes onto the printed material.
- » Offset Lithography is for paper printing and can print both CMYK and Spot Colors.

VS

Flexography & Dry Offset

- » Flexography printing works very much like a typical rubber stamp.
- » Flexible plates are rolled in ink and then transferred onto the final piece.
- » This printing method can be used for paper, plastic, or any special substrates.
- » Flexography can only use spot colors.
- » Dry Offset works a lot like Flexography but the ink is transferred or onto another roller before it goes onto the final product.

CMYK Printing: (4 color process)

- » This term refers to a printing process that uses a mixture of Cyan, Magenta, Yellow, and Black (CMYK) to reproduce a wide range of colors.
- » A wide range of colors can be printed with just 4 color plates, so the number of colors allowable on each design is much higher.
- » PANTONE® (PMS) color codes can be provided as a final color reference, but not all PANTONE® (PMS) colors can be reproduced accurately.

VS

Spot Color Printing

- » This term refers to a printing process that uses pre-mixed ink for each color. This limits the number of colors but ensures greater color accuracy.
- » The industry standard for spot colors is the PANTONE® Matching System (PMS) and will be used for all spot colors.
- » Due to the use of food-grade inks, not all PANTONE® colors can be achieved.
- » PANTONE® colors will vary on finished products depending on the material and may vary across multiple materials.

Disclaimers

Artwork

Clients take full responsibility in obtaining the copyrights of the design(s) involved in their custom print order.

Color Accuracy

There is a much higher degree of color accuracy when PANTONE® Color codes are provided. When a PANTONE Color code is provided, finished products are expected to be within 2 PANTONE Colors, either up or down (refer to PANTONE Solid Coated or Uncoated color book). Due to food grade inks, not all PANTONE Color codes can be achieved, and any possible replacement is at the manufacturer's discretion.

Ink Odor

Custom printed products can have a lingering odor as a result of printing with food grade inks. A degree of ink odor should be expected in all custom printed products. Any replacement is at the manufacturer's discretion.

Plate Charges

New custom print orders will be subject to plate fees. Plate fees are charged per color, per item. Re-print orders will not be charged plate fees if the existing plates are still in good condition. Customers will be notified if new plates will be necessary for their re-print orders and subsequently billed for the new plates.

Minimum & Lead Times

All stated minimums apply for each size and/or design ordered. Minimums are subject to change at any time. Due to the nature of custom printed products, there may be a +/- 10% over/under run (variance between amount ordered and amount produced). Lead times are estimated and are not guaranteed.

Print Gap

For plastic cups, a small gap is left between the leading edge of the design so that the design does not overlap. For paper cups and food containers, normal printing procedure is to leave a white area around the bottom rim, as indicated on the template. Clients can make a special request to extend artwork to the bottom rim but this can result in the printed design cracking once the paper is folded. If this does occur, it will leave flakes inside the cups once they are stacked.
